

More than 30,000 Americans have Williams syndrome The condition occurs in 1 of every 10,000 births worldwide

People with Williams syndrome are known for their friendly and endearing personalities. They generally seek out and thrive on social – emotional connections.

However, they often lack social finesse and may have a limited ability to read social cues. This combination of hunger for emotional connection and a limited “higher level” understanding of social cues can lead to inadvertent social blunders. It can also place some individuals at risk for victimization or being misinterpreted as a victimizer in public.
